According to existing data, at least four and possibly five, separate, distinct, and independent, and possibly overlapping, pathways exist for the processing of information in the human brain. These pathways are: (1) the visual pathway, (2) the auditory pathway, (3) the somatosensory pathway, (4) the olfactory pathway, and (5) the gustatory pathway. Each of these pathways is a complex system of neural circuitry that processes information in a specific way. The visual pathway, for example, is responsible for processing visual information from the eyes. The auditory pathway is responsible for processing auditory information from the ears. The somatosensory pathway is responsible for processing information from the body's sensory organs. The olfactory pathway is responsible for processing olfactory information from the nose. The gustatory pathway is responsible for processing gustatory information from the tongue.

And not only is the effort to find a common ground between the two sides of the aisle in the case of the Supreme Court, but also in the case of the other branches of government. The House of Representatives, for example, has passed a number of bills that are aimed at reducing the federal deficit, and the Senate has passed a number of bills that are aimed at increasing the federal deficit. This is a clear example of the two sides of the aisle working together to address a common problem.
